TWO COUSINS

ALMOST from the beginning Freddy Loomis wished his cousin Tammy Loomis would move away. At first, when Tammy moved to town Freddy was glad to have a cousin his own age in his class, having so many similar interests. But when his life became too constantly competitive, Freddy didn't like it one bit.

It started while playing basketball. Tammy showed a trick way of slipping back on the court and dropping a ball into the basket, making it seem hard, but Freddy knew it wasn't. It was one of those things you did if you could, and found it impossible if you couldn't. Maybe it was talent. But Freddy resented the way they applauded Tammy for an "impossible" shot. It was like rewarding a bird for flying.

And that was the way it went in Trigonometry, in American History, in school activities. Tammy seemed to be making a career out of making Freddy Loomis seem like nothing special.

Freddy was disturbed. It wasn't particularly because he wanted to shine, no more than other kids; something was wrong with a fellow if he didn't have drive and ambition to be better . . . to at least do the best that was in him. But to be made conscious of the struggle every inch of the way ever since Tammy came to Kanoot High wasn't good.

So, for about the last year, Freddy had made a special effort to do different things than Tammy did. At first he felt he was acting somewhat underhanded, the way he went about learning what elective courses Tammy chose, the off-hand questioning, listening when he didn't appear to be listening, and then making fast, opposite decisions. When Tammy made a special effort with the swimming team, Freddy, who swam like a fish, developed an "ear-ache" that kept him from trying out there. The doctor could find nothing wrong, but Freddy made a big excuse out of it.

He wasn't happy about the way he acted; it seemed as though he was being scared off, as though he was running away, but he was free of that constant, competitive disturbance.

When Tammy appeared on the school paper staff, a place where Freddy had felt really secure, he fought the urge to leave. Freddy liked the work on the Record. He liked turning out his Roving Reporter assignments. He liked the comments on the articles, the approval, the flattering remarks for his keen analysis and coverage of events, for his apt use of the well-turned phrase. But when Tammy started writing up sports, and doing it in a spritely, professional way, and then added editing, infringing on Freddy's field, Freddy quickly developed a lot of outside work that kept him from being on the Masthead of the Record.

His mother worried about his behavior, and his father suggested taking him to a doctor, to find out if something very wrong might be the matter with their son.

"Pop," Freddy said, kidding himself, "I'm all right. There are just too many things I want to do. I've grown up from that kid stuff."

"What kid stuff?" his father said, "that's not kid stuff. I've always been proud of what you've been able to accomplish."

"I wonder if Gretta Loomis is experiencing something like this with Tammy," Ma said.

"No," his father said. "That's why I'm concerned. I just don't understand it. They're the same age . . . about the same temperament. But Tammy doesn't seem to be going through this change as he travels through his adolescence."

CONTINUED

Freddy didn't join in that conversation. He thought the stress being placed on his adolescence was ridiculous. And he wished that his parents, and some of the people who made a career of Adolescence, would just keep quiet for a long time about the subject. He would like to know what their Adolescences had been like. No, Freddy Loomis didn't think a single solitary thing was wrong with him that Tammy Loomis' moving far away wouldn't change for the better.

"Where are you going?" his father asked him as Freddy walked out of the room.

Freddy paused respectfully. "Down to the workshop. I'm fooling around with some things." He went out.

"It's a phase," pa said. "Good thing he can work down in that shop in the basement. I'm more glad I set up that place than anything else I've done for that boy."

In the shop, Freddy got a piece of wood from the bench and checked its squareness. He ran his hand over the smooth side. He admired the grain. Then he made a dry run assembly of what he had been spending quiet, almost secretive hours, doing. Then he stepped back to see what he had done; it was a handsome table.

There was some more work to be done. He disassembled it, and then spent some time improving his design for a tidy package, so that his table could be marketable, ready for home assembling. Satisfied, he took it all up to show his parents.

"Whatcha got there, son?" pa asked, keenly interested, and deciding that this was important enough to leave his T.V. for. Ma came in from the kitchen.

Tammy, under their interested eyes, and in less than a minute, set up a full-sized, attractive piece of furniture.

His mother was delighted. She hugged Freddy with complete admiration and love, exclaiming, "It's wonderful!"

And then pa, instead of adding to the good feeling Freddy felt, snatched the ground out from under his feet. "This is about the funniest coincidence," pa was saying. "Tammy, when I was out there this afternoon, showed me a set of toys that he wants to manufacture. A Do-It-Yourself-Toy-Home-Assembly series of kit." He shook his head, "These Junior Achievement kids make me feel as though I'm ready to retire."

"Dad," Ma shoved pa lightly. "Don't be jealous of the competition, just because your son takes after you."

"How about it, son . . . want to take me in as a partner?" Pa grinned.

But Freddy wasn't in a joking mood. He felt like smashing something. He remember all the other times Tammy just happened to compete with him.

Why? he demanded. "Why?"

And then Freddy decided to do something he hadn't done in some time. It was too big a thing, too much of himself was wrapped in this. Putting his table back into the package, he decided to take it and pay his cousin a visit.

Tammy greeted him with surprise. "Freddy, glad you came over."

He led Freddy to his workshop and showed him his toys. And Freddy, without a word, showed Tammy his table. Tammy's eyes glowed with genuine admiration. "Man, this is cool!" he said. "I wish . . ."

"You wish," Freddy said bitterly. "Ever since you came here, you've been copying me!"

"Now wait just a sec . . ." Tammy started, and then his mood changed. "Freddy," he suggested, "grow up a little, like I did."

"What do you mean?"

"This. I thought I finally had something you couldn't do. I've been jealous of you. But it's all clear in my mind now. Why shouldn't we do similar things? We're first cousins. Same age. Similar backgrounds. There're good reasons for everything that's happened. This thing now . . . it ends battling you, for me . . . I suggest we become partners. Separate, we'll do all right. But together . . . thinking the same way. What a combo!"

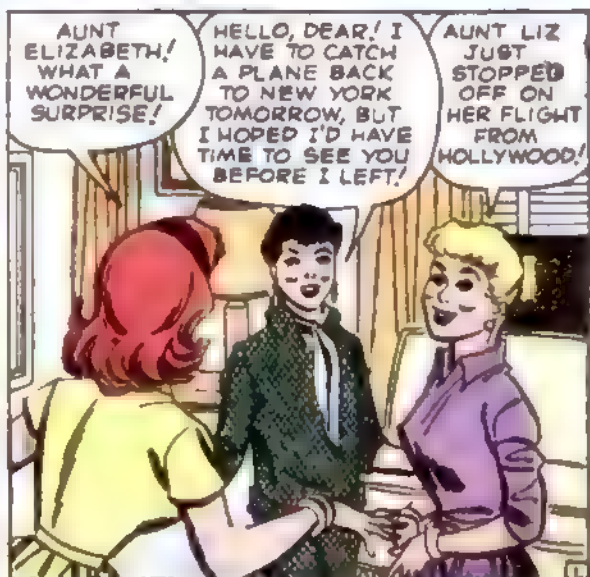

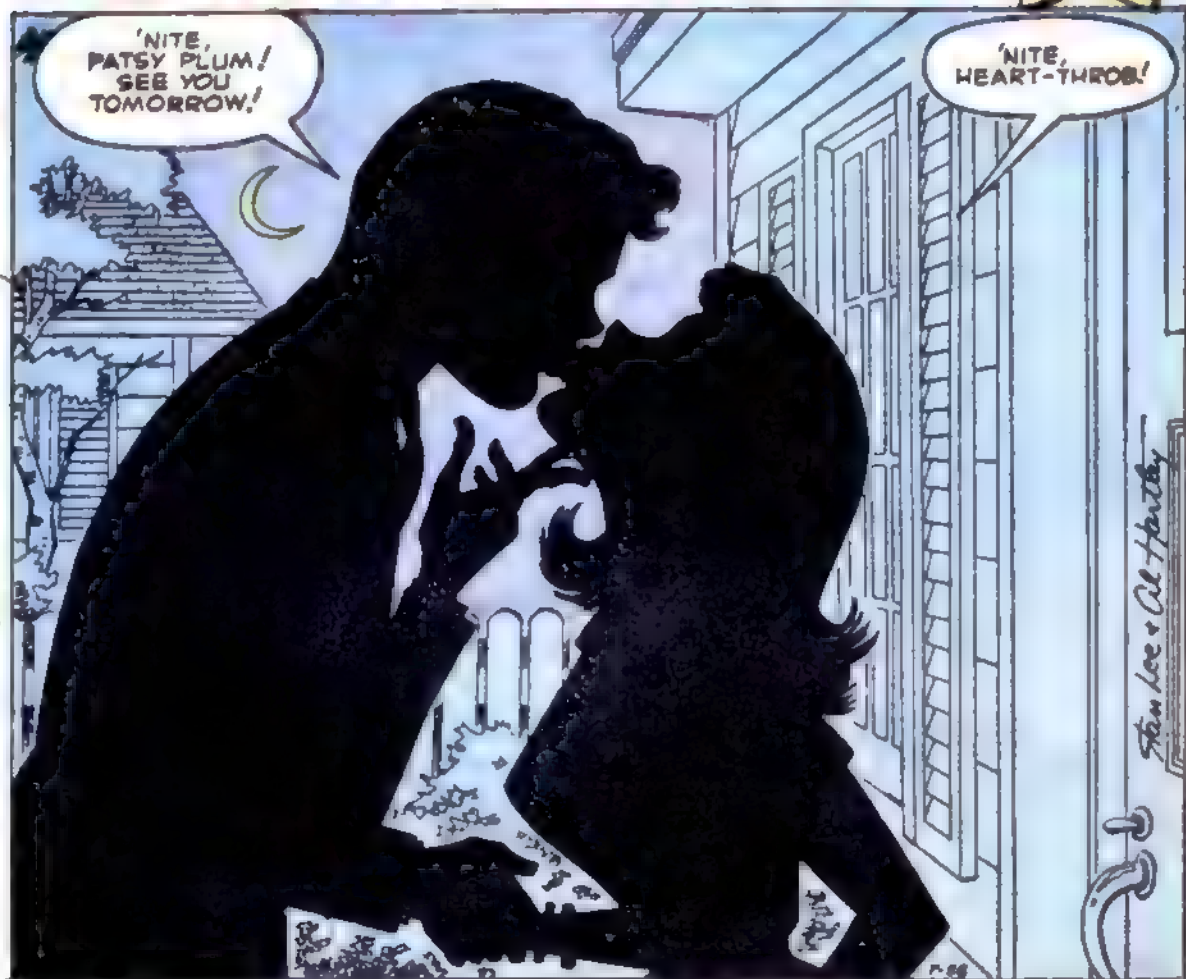

Freddy grinned, stuck his hand out. "Freddy and Tammy Enterprises."

Tammy thought seriously, "How about THE TWO COUSINS? That way no one gets top billing."

"Man . . ." Freddy clapped Tammy on the back, "we're in business!"
